K.

K, the eleventh letter of the English alphabet, is borrowed from the Greeks, being the same character as the Greek kappa, answering to the Oriental kaph. It represents a close articulation, formed by pressing the root of the tongue against the upper part of the mouth, with a depression of the lower jaw and opening of the teeth. It is usually denominated a guttural, but is more properly a palatal. Before all the vowels, it has one invariable sound, corresponding with that of c before a, o, and u, as in keel, ken. In monosyllables, it is used after c, as in crack, check, deck, being necessary to exhibit a correct pronunciation in the derivatives, cracked, checked, decked, cracking; for without it, c, before the vowels e and i, would be sounded like s.

Formerly, k was added to c in certain words of Latin origin, as in musick, publick, republick. But in modern practice, k is very properly omitted, being entirely superfluous, and the more properly as it is never written in the derivatives, musical, publication, republican.

K is silent before n, as in know, knife, knee.

As a numeral, K stands for 250; and with a stroke over it, thus, K, for 250,000.

This character was not used by the ancient Romans, and rarely in the later ages of their empire. In the place of k, they used c, as in clino, for the Greek κλινω. In the Teutonic dialects, this Greek letter is sometimes represented by h. [See H.]

KYR-I-O-LOG'IC-AL, } λογεω, to speak properly; κυριολογια, a discourse consisting of proper words; κυριος and λογος.]

Serving perfectly to denote objects by conventional signs or alphabetical characters. Letronne.

The original Greek alphabet of sixteen letters was called kyriologic, because it represented the pure elementary sounds.

L.

L, the twelfth letter of the English alphabet, is usually denominated a semi-vowel, or a liquid. It represents an imperfect articulation, formed by placing the tip of the tongue against the gum that incloses the roots of the upper teeth; but the sides of the tongue not being in close contact with the roof of the mouth, the breath of course not being entirely intercepted, this articulation is attended with an imperfect sound. The shape of the letter is evidently borrowed from that of the Oriental lamed, or lomad, nearly coinciding with the Samaritan 2.

L has only one sound in English, as in like, canal. At the end of monosyllables, it is often doubled, as in fall, full, tell, bell; but not after diphthongs and digraphs; foul, fool, prowl, growl, foal, &c., being written with a single l.

With some nations, l and r are commutable; as in Greek λιριον, L. lilium; It. scorta, an escort, Sp. and Port. escolta. Indeed, l and r are letters of the same organ.

By some nations of Celtic origin, l at the beginning of words is aspirated and doubled in writing, as in the W. lled, L. latus; llan, a lawn; llawr, a floor; Sp. llamar, L. clamo.

In some words, l is mute, as in half, calf, walk, talk, chalk.

In our mother tongue, the Anglo-Saxon, l is sometimes preceded by h, and aspirated, as in hlaf, loaf; hladan, to lade or load; hlot, lot; hlinian, hleonian, to lean, Gr. κλινω, L. clino. In the latter word, the Saxon h represents the Greek κ and Latin c, as it does in many other words.

In English words, the terminating syllable le is unaccented, the e is silent, and l has a feeble sound; as in able, eagle, pronounced abl, eagl.

As a numeral, L. denotes 50, and with a dash, $\bar{L}$, 50,000. As an abbreviation, in accounts, L. stands for pound, [L. libra, pound.] It is also used for book, or division of a work, [L. liber.] In Latin, it stands for Lucius; and L. L. S. for a sesterce, or two libræ and a half. Encyc.

The word is sometimes used for any other standard or flag.

†1. A rule, particularly an established or permanent rule, prescribed by the supreme power of a state to its subjects, for regulating their actions, particularly their social actions. Laws are imperative or mandatory, commanding what shall be done; prohibitory, restraining from what is to be forborne; or permissive, declaring what may be done without incurring a penalty. The laws which enjoin the duties of piety and morality are prescribed by God and found in the Scriptures.

Law is beneficence acting by rule. Burke.

†2. Municipal law, is a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power of a state, commanding what its subjects are to do, and prohibiting what they are to forbear; a statute.

Municipal or civil laws are established by the decrees, edicts, or ordinances of absolute princes, as emperors and kings, or by the formal acts of the legislatures of free states. LAWS, therefore, is sometimes equivalent to DECREE, EDICT, or ORDINANCE.

3. Law of nature, is a rule of conduct arising out of the natural relations of human beings, established by the Creator, and existing prior to any positive precept. These rules depend on natural law, or the principles of justice which spring from the social state; or they are founded on customs, compacts, treaties, leagues, and agreements, between independent communities.

8. Moral law; a law which prescribes to men their religious and social duties, in other words, their duties to God and to each other. LESS, for UNLESS. [Not in use.]

LESS, a terminating syllable of many nouns and some adjectives, is the Sax. leas, Goth. laus, belonging to the verb lysan, lausyan, to loose, free, separate. Hence it is a privative word, denoting destitution; as, a witless man, a man destitute of wit; childless, without children; fatherless; faithless; pennyless; lawless, &c.

LESS, a. [Sax. læs; perhaps allied to Dan. liser, to abate, to lessen, to relieve, to ease. Less has the sense of the comparative degree of little.]

With this verb corresponds the English late, D. laat, Sw. lat, Dan. lad, slothful, lazy; and the G. lass, feeble, lazy, coincides with lassen, supra, and this may be the Eng. lazy. To let out, like L. elocare, is to lease, Fr. laisser. Let is the Fr. laisser, in a different dialect. By the German and Welsh, it appears that the last radical may have originally been th, ts, or tz, or other compound. See Class Ld, No. 2, 15, 19, 23, 32, and Class Ls, No. 30.]

1. A defamatory writing. [L. libellus, famosus.] Hence, the epithet being omitted, libel expresses the same thing. Any book, pamphlet, writing, or picture, containing representations, maliciously made or published, tending to bring a person into contempt, or expose him to public hatred and derision. The communication of such defamatory writing to a single person, is considered in law a publication. It is immaterial, with respect to the essence of a libel, whether the matter of it is true or false, since the provocation, and not the falsity, is the thing to be punished criminally. But in a civil action, a libel must appear to be false, as well as scandalous. Blackstone.

LIB'ER-TY, n.† [L. libertas, from liber, free; Fr. liberté; It. libertà; Sp. libertad. Class Lb, No. 24, 27, 30, 31.]

1. Freedom from restraint, in a general sense, and applicable to the body, or to the will or mind. The body is at liberty when not confined; the will or mind is at liberty when not checked or controlled. A man enjoys liberty when no physical force operates to restrain his actions or volitions.

2. Natural liberty consists in the power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, except from the laws of nature. It is a state of exemption from the control of others, and from positive laws, and the institutions of social life. This liberty is abridged by the establishment of government.

3. Civil liberty is the liberty of men in a state of society, or natural liberty, so far only abridged and restrained, as is necessary and expedient for the safety and interest of the society, state, or nation. A restraint of natural liberty, not necessary or expedient for the public, is tyranny or oppression. Civil liberty is an exemption from the arbitrary will of others, which exemption is secured by established laws, which restrain every man from injuring or controlling another. Hence the restraints of law are essential to civil liberty.

The liberty of one depends not so much on the removal of all restraint from him, as on the due restraint upon the liberty of others. Ames.

In this sentence, the latter word liberty denotes natural liberty.

4. Political liberty is sometimes used as synonymous with civil liberty. But it more properly designates the liberty of a nation, the freedom of a nation or state from all unjust abridgment of its rights and independence by another nation. Hence we often speak of the political liberties of Europe, or the nations of Europe.

5. Religious liberty is the free right of adopting and enjoying opinions on religious subjects, and of worshiping the Supreme Being according to the dictates of conscience, without external control.

9. A space in which one is permitted to pass without restraint, and beyond which he may not lawfully pass; with a plural; as, the liberties of a prison.

The sense of like, similar, is even, smooth, equal; but this sense may be from laying, pressing; and hence this word may be allied to the Eth. ለከዐ lakeo, to stamp, seal, impress, whence its derivative, an image; or the sense be taken from rubbing or shaving. We observe that like has also the sense of please; to like is, to be pleased. Now, if p in L. placeo is a prefix, the latter may be formed on the root of like. And if de is a prefix in delight, delecto, delicious, delicate, these may be of the same family. Like is evidently from the same root as the Ch. and Heb. חלק, Ar. خلق chalaka, to be or make smooth. 2 Such as may be liked; pleasing; as, a likely man or woman.

[This use of likely is not obsolete, as Johnson affirms, nor is it vulgar. But the English and their descendants in America differ in the application. The English apply the word to external appearance, and with them likely is equivalent to handsome, well-formed; as, a likely man, a likely horse. When the logarithms form a series in arithmetical progression, the corresponding natural numbers form a series in geometrical progression. Thus,

Logarithms,	0	1	2	3	4	5
Natural numbers,	1	10	100	1000	10000	100000

The addition and subtraction of logarithms answer to the multiplication and division of their natural numbers. In like manner, involution is performed by multiplying the logarithm of any number by the number denoting the required power; and evolution, by dividing the logarithm by the number denoting the required root.

Logarithms are the invention of Baron Napier, lord of Marchiston, in Scotland; but the kind now in use were invented by Henry Briggs, professor of geometry in Gresham College, at Oxford. They are extremely useful in abridging the labor of trigonometrical calculations.

LOOK, v. t. [Sax. locian; G. lugen; Sans. loch, lokkan. It is perhaps allied to W. lygu, to appear, to shine. (See LIGHT.) The primary sense is to stretch, to extend, to shoot; hence, to direct the eye. We observe its primary sense is nearly the same as that of seek. Hence, to look for is to seek.]
1. To direct the eye toward an object, with the intention of seeing it.
When the object is within sight, look is usually followed by on or at. We look on or at a picture; we look on or at the moon; we can not look on or at the unclouded sun without pain.
At, after look, is not used in our version of the Scriptures. In common usage, at or on is now used indifferently in many cases, and yet in other cases usage has established a preference. In general, on is used in the more solemn forms of expression. Moses was afraid to look on God. The Lord look on you and judge. In these and similar phrases, the use of at would be condemned, as expressing too little solemnity.
In some cases, at seems to be more properly used before very distant objects; but the cases can hardly be defined.
The particular direction of the eye is expressed by various modifying words; as, to look down, to look up, to look back, to look forward, to look from, to look round, to look out, to look under. When the object is not in sight, look is followed by after, or for. Hence, to look after, or look for, is equivalent to seek or search, or to expect.

And looks it through, but to it can not pass. Dryden.

1. In a general sense, to be pleased with; to regard with affection on account of some qualities which excite pleasing sensations, or desire of gratification. We love a friend on account of some qualities which give us pleasure in his society. We love a man who has done us a favor; in which case gratitude enters into the composition of our affection. We love our parents and our children, on account of their connection with us, and on account of many qualities which please us. We love to retire to a cool shade in summer. We love a warm room in winter. We love to hear an eloquent advocate. The Christian loves his Bible. In short, we love whatever gives us pleasure and delight, whether animal or intellectual; and if our hearts are right, we love God above all things, as the sum of all excellence, and all the attributes which can communicate happiness to intelligent beings. In other words, the Christian loves God with the love of complacency in his attributes, the love of benevolence toward the interests of his kingdom, and the love of gratitude for favors received.

Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. — Matt. xxii.
Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. — Matt. xxii.

2. To have benevolence or good will for. John iii.

LÖVE, v. i. To delight; to take pleasure. Smart.

LÖVE, (luv,) n. An affection of the mind excited by beauty and worth of any kind, or by the qualities of an object which communicate pleasure, sensual or intellectual. It is opposed to HATRED. Love between the sexes is a compound affection, consisting of esteem, benevolence, and animal desire. Love is excited by pleasing qualities of any kind, as by kindness, benevolence, charity, and by the qualities which render social intercourse agreeable. In the latter case, love is ardent friendship, or a strong attachment springing from good will and esteem, and the pleasure derived from the company, civilities, and kindnesses of others.

Between certain natural relatives, love seems to be in some cases instinctive. Such is the love of a mother for her child, which manifests itself toward an infant, before any particular qualities in the child are unfolded. This affection is apparently as strong in irrational animals as in human beings.

We speak of the love of amusement, the love of books, the love of money, and the love of whatever contributes to our pleasure or supposed profit.

The love of God is the first duty of man, and this springs from just views of his attributes or excellences of character, which afford the highest delight to the sanctified heart. Esteem and reverence constitute ingredients in this affection, and a fear of offending him is its inseparable effect.

And God said, Let us make man after our image and likeness. "Og Gud skapade mannenn epter sinne mind, epter Guds mind skapade hann hann, og han skapade thau karlman og kvinnu." Literally, And God shaped man after his image, after God's image shaped he them, and he shaped them male and female; karlman, male, (see CARL and CHURL,) and kvinnu, female, that is, queen, woman. Icelandic Bible. Man, in its radical sense, agrees almost precisely with Adam, in the Shemitic languages.]

MASS, n. [Sax. mæsa, mæsse; Fr. messe; It. messa; Sp. misa; D. misse; G. and Dan. messe; Sw. messa; Low L. missa, from mitto, to dismiss. In the ancient churches, the public services at which the catechumens were permitted to be present, were called missa catechumenorum, because at the close of them proclamation was made thus: Ite, missa est, sc. ecclesia. Then followed the communion service, which was called missa fidelium; and which, under the name of missa, or the mass, still constitutes the principal part of public worship in the Roman Catholic churches. Murdock.

The word signifies, primarily, leisure; cessation from labor, from the L. missus, remissus, like the L. feriæ; hence, a feast or holiday Laws of Alfred, 39. "Be mæsse dæge freolse." De festivitate diei festi. See also Laws of Cnute, Lib. 1, 14, and 2, 42. Hence, Sax. hlafmæsse, lemmas, bread-feast, and Martin-mas, Michael-mas, Candlemas, Christmas.]

1. The murder of an individual, or the slaughter of numbers of human beings, with circumstances of cruelty; the indiscriminate killing of human beings, without authority or necessity, and without forms, civil or military. It differs from assassination, which is a private killing. It differs from carnage, which is rather the effect of slaughter than slaughter itself, and is applied to the authorized destruction of men in battle, or other great destruction of lives by violence. Massacre is sometimes called butchery, from its resemblance to the killing of cattle. If a soldier kills a man in battle in his own defence, it is a lawful act; it is killing, and it is slaughter, but it is not a massacre. Whereas, if a soldier kills an enemy after he has surrendered, it is massacre, a killing without necessity, often without authority, contrary to the usages of nations, and of course with cruelty. The practice of killing prisoners, even when authorized by the commander, is properly massacre; as the authority given proceeds from cruelty. We have all heard of the massacre of the Protestants in France, in the reign of Charles IX.; and frequent instances of barbarous massacre occur in the war between the Turks and Greeks.

MAS'SI-COT, } n. [Fr. massicot.]
MAS'TI-COT, }

Protoxyd of lead or yellow oxyd of lead, composed of one equivalent of lead and one equivalent of oxygen. Lead exposed to the air while melting is covered with a gray, dusky pellicle. This pellicle, carefully taken off, is reduced, by exposure to the joint action of heat and air, to a greenish-gray powder, inclining to yellow. This oxyd, separated from the grains of lead by sifting, and exposed to a more intense heat, sufficient to make it red hot, assumes a deep yellow color. In this state it is called massicot. Massicot, slowly heated by a moderate fire, takes a beautiful red color, becomes a salt composed of two equivalents of the protoxyd of lead, and one equivalent of the deutoxyd, and obtains the name of minium. Fourcroy.

The word is also used for other low or flat lands, particularly lands appropriated to the culture of grass.

The word is said to be applied, in Great Britain, to land somewhat watery, but covered with grass. Johnson.

This word seems to be allied to mill, L. mola, and to L. mollis, Eng. mellow. Mercury is used in barometers to ascertain the weight of the atmosphere, and in thermometers to determine the temperature of the air, for which latter purpose it is well adapted by its power of equable contraction and expansion, and the extensive range between its freezing and boiling points. 1. A simple, fixed, shining, opaque body or substance, having a peculiar luster, known as the metallic luster, insoluble in water, fusible by heat, and a good conductor of heat and electricity. Many of the metals are also malleable or extensible by the hammer, and some of them extremely ductile. Metals are mostly fossil, sometimes found native or pure, but more generally combined with other matter. Some metals are more malleable than others; and this circumstance gave rise to the distinction of metals and semi-metals—a distinction little regarded at the present day. Recent discoveries have enlarged the list of the metals. Twelve are malleable, viz., platinum, gold, silver, mercury, lead, copper, tin, iron, zinc, palladium, nickel, and cadmium. The following sixteen are not sufficiently tenacious to bear extension by beating; viz., arsenic, antimony, bismuth, cobalt, manganese, tellurium, titanium, columbium, molybden, tungsten, chrome, osmium, iridium, rhodium, uranium, and cerium.

Encyc. Nicholson. Thomson. Phillips. Ure.

To these may be added potassium, sodium, barium, strontium, calcium, lithium, and several others.

Here Marius, by a synecdoche or antonomasia, is put for any ambitious, turbulent man, and this, by a metonymy of the cause, for the ill effects of such a temper to the public. Bailey. Encyc.

Thus, "that man is a fox," is a metaphor; but "that man is like a fox," is a similitude or comparison. So when I say, "the soldiers were lions in combat," I use a metaphor; but when I say, "the soldiers fought like lions," I use a similitude. In metaphor, the similitude is contained in the name; a man is a fox, means, a man is as crafty as a fox. So we say, a man bridles his anger, that is, restrains it as a bridle restrains a horse. Beauty awakens love of tender passions; opposition fires courage.

The science of the principles and causes of all things existing; hence, the science of mind or intelligence. This science comprehends ontology, or the science which treats of the nature, essence, and qualities, or attributes of being; cosmology, the science of the world, which treats of the nature and laws of matter and of motion; anthroposophy, which treats of the powers of man, and the motions by which life is produced; psychology, which treats of the intellectual soul; pneumatology, or the science of spirits or angels, &c. Metaphysical theology, called by Leibnitz and others theodicy, treats of the existence of God, his essence and attributes. 2. A French measure of length, equal to $39\frac{37}{100}$ English inches, the standard of linear measure, being the ten millionth part of the distance from the equator to the north pole, as ascertained by actual measurement of an arc of the meridian. Olmsted.

Thus we say, the natural method, and the artificial or sexual system of Linnæus, though the latter is not a perfect system. Ed. Encyc.

marra, to pass, to walk. If the original sense of the L. mos, moris, was settled custom, the word may be from the root of morer, to stop, delay; Eng. demur.]

1. Relating to the practice, manners, or conduct of men, as social beings, in relation to each other, and with reference to right and wrong. The word moral is applicable to actions that are good or evil, virtuous or vicious, and has reference to the law of God as the standard by which their character is to be determined. The word, however, may be applied to actions which affect only, or primarily and principally, a person's own happiness.

Keep at the least within the compass of moral actions, which have in them vice or virtue. Hooker.
Mankind is broken loose from moral bands. Dryden.

2. Subject to the moral law, and capable of moral actions; bound to perform social duties; as, a moral agent or being.

3. Supported by the evidence of reason or probability; founded on experience of the ordinary course of things; as, moral certainty, distinguished from physical or mathematical certainty or demonstration.

4. Conformed to rules of right, or to the divine law respecting social duties; virtuous; just; as when we say, a particular action is not moral.

5. Conformed to law and right in exterior deportment; as, he leads a good moral life.

6. Reasoning or instructing with regard to vice and virtue.

7. In general, moral denotes something which respects the conduct of men, and their relations as social beings whose actions have a bearing on each other's rights and happiness, and are therefore right or wrong, virtuous or vicious; as, moral character; moral views; moral knowledge; moral sentiments; moral maxims; moral approbation; moral doubts; moral justice; moral virtues; moral obligations, &c. Or moral denotes something which respects the intellectual powers of man, as distinct from his physical powers. 2. The practice of the moral duties; virtue. We often admire the politeness of men whose morality we question.

3. The quality of an action which renders it good; the conformity of an act to the divine law, or to the principles of rectitude. This conformity implies that the act must be performed by a free agent, and from a motive of obedience to the divine will. This is the strict theological and scriptural sense of morality. But we often apply the word to actions which accord with justice and human laws, without reference to the motives from which they proceed.

MORT'GAGE, (mor'gaje,) n. [Fr. mort, dead, and gage, pledge.]
1. Literally, a dead pledge; the grant of an estate in fee as security for the payment of money, and on the condition that if the money shall be paid according to the contract, the grant shall be void, and the mortgagee shall reconvey the estate to the mortgager. Formerly the condition was, that if the mortgager should repay the money at the day specified, he might then re-enter on the estate granted in pledge; but the modern practice is for the mortgagee, on receiving payment, to reconvey the land to the mortgager. Before the time specified for payment, that is, between the time of contract and the time limited for payment, the estate is conditional, and the mortgagee is called tenant in mortgage; but on failure of payment at the time limited, the estate becomes absolute in the mortgagee. But in this case, courts of equity interpose, and if the estate is of more value than the debt, they will, on application, grant a reasonable time for the mortgager to redeem the estate. This is called the equity of redemption. Blackstone.

W. madrez, matter, purulent discharge.

We observe that in some other languages, as well as in English, the same word signifies a female parent, and the thick slime formed in vinegar; and in all the languages of Europe here cited, the orthography is nearly the same as that of mud and matter. The question then occurs, whether the name of a female parent originated in a word expressing matter, mold; either the soil of the earth, as the producer, or the like substance, when shaped and fitted as a mold for castings; or whether the name is connected with the opinion that the earth is the mother of all productions; whence the word mother-earth. We are informed by a fragment of Sanchoniathon, that the ancient Phenicians considered mud, μωτ, to be the substance from which all things were formed. (See MUD.) The word matter is evidently from the

Ar. مدّ madda, to secrete, eject, or discharge a purulent substance; and I think can not have any direct connection with mud. But in the Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese, the same word madre signifies mother, and a mold for castings; and the northern languages, particularly the German and Danish, seem to establish the fact that the proper sense of mother is matrix. Hence mother of pearl, the matrix of pearl. If this word had its origin in the name of the earth used for the forms of castings, it would not be a singular fact; for our word mold, in this sense, I suppose to be so named from mold, fine earth. The question remains sub judice.]

Animal motion is that which is performed by animals in consequence of volition, or an act of the will; but how the will operates on the body in producing motion, we can not explain. Mechanical motion is effected by the force or power of one body acting on another. Perpetual motion is that which is effected or supplied by itself, without the impulse or intervention of any external cause. Hitherto it has been found impossible to invent a machine that has this principle.

We see that these words, mutiny and mew, are from the same root as L. muto, to change, W. mudaw, which is radically the same word as L. moto, to move. Mutiny is formed from the French mutin, a derivative word, and mew from the root or verb. So motin, in Spanish, is a derivative, while muda, change, and Port. mudar, to change feathers, are directly from the verb; Eth. mit, to turn; Ar. matau, to move or drive, or mata, to drive. Class Md, No. 14, 10.]

An insurrection of soldiers or seamen against the authority of their commanders; open resistance of officers, or opposition to their authority. A mutiny is properly the act of numbers, but by statutes and orders for governing the army and navy in different countries, the acts which constitute mutiny are multiplied and defined; and acts of individuals, amounting to a resistance of the authority or lawful commands of officers, are declared to be mutiny. Any attempt to excite opposition to lawful authority, or any act of contempt toward officers, or disobedience of commands, is by the British Mutiny Act declared to be mutiny. Any concealment of mutinous acts, or neglect to attempt a suppression of them, is declared also to be mutiny.

1. A body of people inhabiting the same country, or united under the same sovereign or government; as, the English nation; the French nation. It often happens that many nations are subject to one government, in which case, the word nation usually denotes a body of people speaking the same language, or a body that has formerly been under a distinct government, but has been conquered, or incorporated with a larger nation. Thus the empire of Russia comprehends many nations, as did formerly the Roman and Persian empires. Nation, as its etymology imports, originally denoted a family or race of men descended from a common progenitor, like tribe, but by emigration, conquest, and intermixture of men of different families, this distinction is in most countries lost.

But more generally, natural history is limited to a description of the earth and its productions, including zoölogy, botany, geology, mineralogy, &c.

Natural orders, in botany, are groups of genera resembling each other.

Natural philosophy originally signified the study of nature in general. In present usage, natural or mechanical philosophy relates to the phenomena and laws of masses of matter, and considers those effects only which are not attended by any change of nature, as motion, &c. It is distinguished from chemistry, which relates to the phenomena and laws of particles of matter, and embraces their changes of nature. Olmsted. It is distinguished from intellectual and moral philosophy, which respect the mind or understanding of man, and the qualities of actions.

And look through nature up to nature's God. Pope.

2. By a metonymy of the effect for the cause, nature is used for the agent, creator, author, producer, of things, or for the powers that produce them. By the expression, "trees and fossils are produced by nature," we mean, they are formed or produced by certain inherent powers in matter, or we mean that they are produced by God, the Creator, the Author of whatever is made or produced. The opinion that things are produced by inherent powers of matter, independent of a supreme, intelligent Author, is atheism. But generally, men mean by nature, thus used, the Author of created things, or the operation of his power.

3. The essence, essential qualities, or attributes, of a thing, which constitute it what it is; as, the nature of the soul; the nature of blood; the nature of a fluid; the nature of plants, or of a metal; the nature of a circle or an angle. When we speak of the nature of man, we understand the peculiar constitution of his body or mind, or the qualities of the species which distinguish him from other animals. When we speak of the nature of a man, or an individual of the race, we mean his particular qualities or constitution; either the peculiar temperament of his body, or the affections of his mind, his natural appetites, passions, disposition, or temper. So of irrational animals.

NĒI'THER, (nē'ther or nī'ther. The former is given in most dictionaries, and still prevails in America. The latter is now common in England,) compound pronoun, pronominal adjective, or a substitute. [Sax. nather, nathor, nauther, or nouther; ne, not, and either or other, not either, or not other. So in L. neuter, ne and uter.]
Not either; not the one or the other.
1. It refers to individual things or persons; as, which road shall I take? Neither, take neither road. The upright judge inclines to neither party.
It is used as a substitute; as, the upright judge inclines to neither of the parties.
He neither loves,
Nor either cares for him. Shak.
2. It refers to a sentence; as, "Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it;" that is, ye shall not eat, not either or other shall ye touch it; ye shall not eat, nor shall ye do the other thing here mentioned, that is, touch it. Gen. iii.
"Fight neither with small nor great, save only with the king;" that is, fight not, either with small or great. I Kings xxii.
Neither, in the first part of a negative sentence, is followed by nor in the subsequent part. It is neither the one nor the other. But or would be most proper, for the negative in neither applies to both parts of the sentence
It is often used in the last member of a negative sentence instead of nor, as in the passage above cited. "Ye shall not eat it, neither shall ye touch it." Here neither is improperly used for nor, for not in the first clause refers only to that clause, and the second negative refers only to the second clause. "Ye shall not eat it, nor shall ye touch it."
In the sentences above, neither is considered to be a conjunction or connecting word, though in fact it is a pronoun or representative of a clause of a sentence.
3. Neither primarily refers to two; not either of two. But by usage it is applicable to any number, referring to individuals separately considered. Five or ten persons being charged with a misdemeanor or riot, each may say, neither of us was present.
4. Neither sometimes closes a sentence in a peculiar manner, thus: "Men come not to the knowledge of ideas thought to be innate, till they come to the use of reason; nor then neither." Locke.
That is, not either when they come to the use of reason, or before.
Formerly, in English, as in Greek and French, two negatives were used for one negation. But in such phrases as that above, good speakers now use either; "nor then either."

1. Conception; mental apprehension of whatever may be known or imagined. We may have a just notion of power, or false notions respecting spirit.

Notion and idea are primarily different; idea being the conception of something visible, as the idea of a square or a triangle; and notion the conception of things invisible or intellectual, as the notion we have of spirits. But from negligence in the use of idea, the two words are constantly confounded.

What hath been generally agreed on, I content myself to assume under the notion of principles. Newton.
Few agree in their notions about these words. Cheyne.
That notion of hunger, cold, sound, color, thought, wish, or fear, which is in the mind, is called the idea of hunger, cold, &c. Watts.

NOT-WITH-STAND'ING; the participle of WITHSTAND, with not prefixed, and signifying not opposing, nevertheless. It retains in all cases its participial signification. For example: "I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant; notwithstanding, in thy days I will not do it, for David thy father's sake." 1 Kings xi. In this passage there is an ellipsis of that after notwithstanding. That refers to the former part of the sentence, I will rend the kingdom from thee; notwithstanding that, (declaration or determination,) in thy days I will not do it. In this and in all cases, notwithstanding, either with or without that or this, constitutes the case absolute or independent.

"It is a rainy day, but notwithstanding that, the troops must be reviewed;" that is, the rainy day not opposing or preventing. That, in this case, is a substitute for the whole first clause of the sentence. It is to that clause what a relative is to an antecedent noun, and which may be used in the place of it; notwithstanding which, that is, the rainy day.

"Christ enjoined on his followers not to publish the cures he wrought; but notwithstanding his injunctions, they proclaimed them." Here, notwithstanding his injunctions is the case independent or absolute; the injunctions of Christ not opposing or preventing.

This word answers precisely to the Latin non obstante, and both are used with nouns or with substitutes for nouns, for sentences or for clauses of sentences. So in the Latin phrase, hoc non obstante, hoc may refer to a single word, to a sentence, or to a series of sentences.

O.

O is the fifteenth letter, and the fourth vowel, in the English alphabet. The shape of this letter seems to have been taken from the circular configuration of the lips in uttering the sound. It corresponds in figure with the Coptic O, and nearly with the Syriac initial and final vau, and the Ethiopic ain. In words derived from the Oriental languages, it often represents the vau of those languages, and sometimes the ain; the original sound of the latter being formed deep in the throat, and with a greater aperture of the mouth.

In English, O has a long sound, as in tone, hone, groan, cloak, roll, droll: a short sound, as in lot, plod, rod, song, lodge, and the sound of oo, or the Italian u, and French ou, as in move, prove. This sound is shortened in words ending in a close articulation, as in book, foot.

The long sound of O is usually denoted by e, at the end of a word or syllable, as in bone, lonely; or by a servile a, as in moan, foal. It is generally long before ll, as in roll; but it is short in doll, loll, and in words of more syllables than one, as in folly, volley.

As a numeral, O was sometimes used by the ancients for 11, and, with a dash over it, (Ō,) for 11,000.

Among the Irish, O, prefixed to the name of a family, denotes progeny, or is a character of dignity; as, O'Neil; O'Carrol.

Among the ancients, O was a mark of triple time, from the notion that the ternary, or number 3, is the most perfect of numbers, and properly expressed by a circle, the most perfect figure.

O is often used as an exclamation, expressing a wish.
O, were he present! Dryden.
It sometimes expresses surprise.
Shakspeare uses O for a circle or oval.

Compliance with a command, prohibition, or known law and rule of duty prescribed; the performance of what is required or enjoined by authority, or the abstaining from what is prohibited, in compliance with the command or prohibition. To constitute obedience, the act or forbearance to act must be in submission to authority; the command must be known to the person, and his compliance must be in consequence of it, or it is not obedience. Obedience is not synonymous with obsequiousness; the latter often implying meanness or servility, and obedience being merely a proper submission to authority. That which duty requires implies dignity of conduct rather than servility. Obedience may be voluntary or involuntary. Voluntary obedience alone can be acceptable to God.

Government must compel the obedience of individuals; otherwise who will seek its protection or fear its vengeance? Ames.

1. That about which any power or faculty is employed, or something apprehended or presented to the mind by sensation or imagination. Thus that quality of a rose which is perceived by the sense of smell, is an object of perception. When the object is not in contact with the organ of sense, there must be some medium through which we obtain the perception of it. The impression which objects make on the senses, must be by the immediate application of them to the organs of sense, or by means of the medium that intervenes between the organs and the objects.
2. That to which the mind is directed for accomplishment or attainment; end; ultimate purpose. Happiness is the object of every man's desires; we all strive to attain to that object. Wealth and honor are pursued with eagerness as desirable objects.

1. In philosophy, an epithet applied to whatever is exterior to the mind, or which is the object of thought or feeling; outward; external. It is opposed to SUBJECTIVE, which see for a fuller explanation.

Objective certainty is when the proposition is certainly true in itself; and subjective, when we are certain of the truth of it. The one is in things, the other in our minds. Watts.

OB'LI-GATE, v. t. [L. obligo; ob and ligo, to bind.]

To bind, as one's self, in a moral and legal sense; to impose on, as a duty which the law or good faith may enforce. A man may obligate himself to pay money, or erect a house, either by bond, by covenant, or by a verbal promise. A man obligates himself only by a positive act of his own. We never say, a man obligates his heirs or executors. Until recently, the sense of this word has been restricted to positive and personal acts; and when moral duty or law binds a person to do something, the word OBLIGE has been used. But this distinction is not now observed.

The millions of mankind, as one vast fraternity, should feel obligated by a sense of duty and the impulse of affection, to realize the equal rights and to subserve the best interests of each other. Proudfit.

OF, (ov,) prep. [Sax. of; G. ab; Sw. Ice. Dan. and D. af; L. ab, but originally af; Gr. απο. The primary sense is departing, issuing, or proceeding from; but this sense has been modified by usage.]

From or out of; proceeding from, as the cause, source, means, author, or agent bestowing.

I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered to you. — 1 Cor. xi.

For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts. — Josh. xi.

It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed. — Lam. iii.

The whole disposing thereof is of the Lord. — Prov. xvi.

Go, inquire of the Lord for me. — 2 Chron. xxxiv.

That holy thing that shall be born of thee. — Luke i.

Hence of is the sign of the genitive case, the case that denotes production; as, the Son of man, the son proceeding from man, produced from man. This is the primary sense, although we now say, produced by man. "Part of these were slain;" that is, a number separate, for part denotes a division; the sense then is, a number from or out of the whole were slain. So, also, "some of these were slain;" that is, some from or out of the others. "I have known him of old, or of a child;" that is, from old times, from a child. "He is of the race of kings;" that is, descended from kings. "He is of noble blood or birth, or of ignoble origin." "No particle of matter, or no body, can move of itself;" that is, by force or strength proceeding from itself, derived from itself.

"The quarrel is not now of fame and tribute, or of wrongs done;" that is, from fame or wrongs, as the cause, and we may render it, concerning, about, relating to.

"Of this little he had some to spare;" that is, some from the whole. It may be rendered out of.

"Of all our heroes thou canst boast alone;" that is, thou alone from the number of heroes. This may be rendered among.

"The best of men, the most renowned of all;" that is, the best from the number of men, the most renowned from the whole; denoting primarily separation, like part.

"I was well entertained of the English consul;" that is, entertained from the consul; my entertainment was from the consul. This use is obsolete, and we use by in lieu of it.

"This does of right belong to us;" that is, from right, de jure; our title proceeds from right.

"The chariot was all of cedar;" that is, made from cedar. So we say, made of gold, made of clay; an application corresponding with our modern use of from; manufactured from wool, or from raw materials. Hence we say, cloth consisting of wool "This is a scheme of his own devising;" that is, from his own devising or device. "If any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth;" that is, as from the ability, as the source of action.

"Of happy, he is become miserable;" that is, from happy; from being happy, he has passed to being miserable. "Of necessity this must prove ruinous;" that is, from necessity, as the cause or source. "Of a hundred take fifty; that is, from a hundred, or out of a hundred, from among a hundred.

Of sometimes implies a part or share.

It is a duty to communicate of those blessings we have received. Franklin.

From is, then, the primary sense of this preposition; a sense retained in off, the same word differently written for distinction. But this sense is appropriately lost in many of its applications; as, a man of genius, a man of courage, a man of rare endowments, a fossil of a red color, or of a hexagonal figure. He lost all hope of relief. This is an affair of the cabinet. He is a man of decayed fortune. What is the price of corn? We say that of, in these and similar phrases, denotes property or possession, making of the sign of the genitive or possessive case. These applications, however, all proceeded from the same primary sense. That which proceeds from, or is produced by, a person, is naturally the property or possession of that person; as, the son of John; and this idea of property, in the course of time, would pass to things not thus produced, but still bearing a relation to another thing. Thus we say, the father of a son, as well as the son of a father. In both senses, other languages also use the same word, as in the French de, dela, and Italian, di, dell. Of, then, has one primary sense, from, departing, issuing, proceeding from or out of, and a derivative sense denoting possession or property.
